

Dear Byrd,

After returning home from your recent leadership seminar, I wanted to give you my thoughts and reflect on what I learned. All good and great leaders need time to focus on their development. Your seminar really made me think about our seasons of self, our seasons of drought, our seasons of self awareness, and our seasons of significance. In my view we have all been in these seasons at one time or another and must constantly work and strive for significance. In our season of significance we are fully and powerfully engaged while our success grows to a new level. It is also in this season that we have the most compelling and productive impact on the growth of others.

While I say thank you, my friend, please also express my thanks to your esteemed colleague, Lawson W. Magruder, III, LTG, US Army Retired. You both are the real deal. I would highly recommend your seminar or academy to anyone who truly wants to get better and grow their leadership abilities to a new level and take their business or enterprise to a new level of significance.

Sincerely,

Thomas H. Coffey
